City and County of East Detroit

November 2030

Twenty neighborhoods

East Detroit’s twenty neighborhoods occupy five planning regions: South/Historic, Central/Downtown, West/Residential, East/Growth and North/Expansion. The figures below are the city’s 2030 population and household profile. Incomes are stated in 2024 dollars for comparison with regional Census data. A renter household is cost-burdened when it spends at least 30% of income on housing.

South and historic neighborhoods

Old Watkins retains its original village, agricultural households, long-standing businesses and older homes. Watkins Junction has rail-adjacent housing and more newly arrived families. Colfax East has a commercial corridor, lower rents and frequent moves. South Yards mixes industrial work, truck traffic and housing close to employment sites. The four neighborhoods have different needs for property records, housing assistance, air quality and service access.

Central city

Civic Square contains administrative buildings and mixed-income housing. Central Station is the city’s major transfer point, with dense apartments and evening employment. Foundry Quarter combines former production sites with offices and family housing. Eastbank contains greenways and newer apartments. Public transportation, street access and property conversion affect the central area more directly than the outer neighborhoods.

West and residential neighborhoods

Inboden has older subdivided housing and more homeowners. Quail Run has townhomes and childcare shortages. West Commons contains family apartments and growing school enrollment. Cavanaugh has many wage-dependent households living near transit. Schools, address changes and service hours affect residents differently depending on their housing and work patterns.

East and growth neighborhoods

Manila is a large mixed-use district facing pressure on new services. Schumaker sits near logistics employment. Harback has small settlements, wells, septic systems and land-conversion disputes. Development permits, utility connections and access roads are prominent concerns.

Northern neighborhoods

Prairie Crossing has new housing and enrollment growth. Northfield is primarily owner-occupied and higher income. Box Elder includes low-lying drainage areas, renters and seasonal workers. Portside lies beside employment and aviation activities. High Prairie has larger lots and high household incomes. Water, drainage, transport and school capacity differ across the region.

Community organizations

R-01 Renter and Tenant Advocacy Council

The council represents renters concerned with housing costs, habitability, eviction proceedings, application barriers and the treatment of housing assistance recipients. Its work overlaps the City Housing Division, the Regional Housing Authority, landlords and the County Court. It is a community organization rather than an agency empowered to decide eligibility or issue court orders.

R-02 Old Watkins and Agricultural Landholders Alliance

The alliance represents long-standing landowners, agricultural families and people affected by new development, changing addresses, drainage and public utility connections. Its interests intersect with zoning, property assessment, the water authority, transportation and the Colorado Air and Space Port.

R-03 Workers and Disability Access Coalition

This group represents shift workers, residents with disabilities and people who need usable services without a smartphone or during ordinary business hours. Transportation, language access, accessible websites, in-person service and disability accommodations affect the ability to reach public services.
